

Interview Question Guide

Market Research on the Creator Economy in Brazil

This document brings together the questions prepared for our conversation. I am conducting research on the Brazilian market for platforms that connect brands with creators, looking at how the sector has evolved in recent years and where it appears to be heading. The questions are organized into thematic blocks, each with a short explanation of what I am trying to understand. No question asks for proprietary, financial, or strategically sensitive information. The goal is to understand market dynamics, not internal operational details.

1. Market Growth and Maturity

Today, only around 2.7% of brands' total media investment in Brazil goes to creators, according to market data used by Creator Ads itself. Understanding what holds back the remainder helps map whether the sector's growth tends to stay concentrated among today's leaders, or whether there is still open structural room to grow. Source: Exame, 2025, with data from Kantar Ibope Media and Statista.

- Investment in creators is still a small slice of brands' total media budget, today somewhere around 2.7%, according to market estimates. In practice, what holds back the growth of that slice? Is it measurement, brand-risk aversion, resistance from agencies, or more of an operational issue?
- When a brand decides to increase its investment in creators, does that budget usually come out of another channel (TV, digital), or is it typically new budget?
- In your view, what needs to happen in the market as a whole for that slice to grow meaningfully over the next few years?

2. Client Profile and Positioning

Every platform ends up serving one type of client better than another. Understanding where each company delivers the most value, and where it recognizes it is not the ideal fit, helps show how the market is segmented today.

- What is the client profile where you deliver the most value today? And is there a profile where you feel your solution is not the ideal fit?
- Do you receive demand from smaller brands or those with leaner budgets? What typically happens with that demand?
- Is there a minimum investment volume for the operation to make sense on your end?
- Is there any level of self-service, or does every campaign go through a dedicated team?

3. Degree of Automation in Operations

Terms like "real-time optimization" and "automatic allocation" come up frequently in the sector's discourse. This block aims to understand, in practice, how much of that automation already happens without human intervention, and how much still depends on manual decision-making.

- In practice, how does the logic of optimizing or reallocating budget across creators work over the course of a campaign? Does it run automatically, or does it go through approval from someone on the team?
- How often does this kind of adjustment happen? Is it continuous, or are there specific review windows?
- When a creator delivers below-expected results in the middle of a campaign, what typically happens?

4. Creator-Side Dynamics

The size of a registered creator base tends to be a public number used as a showcase figure. This block tries to understand what sits behind that number: how many are actually active, and how the relationship with the creator is built and maintained.

- Out of the entire base of registered creators, roughly what proportion is actually active and participating in campaigns?
- How do you bring new creators into the base today? Is it an organic flow (self sign-up), active sourcing on your part, or does it come mainly through referrals?
- Do creators ever decline an invitation when a campaign is offered? What does that acceptance rate generally look like?
- What were the main changes you've made to the relationship with creators — in payment, briefing, or support — and what motivated each one?

5. Role of Agencies

Agencies occupy an ambiguous place in front of platforms like these: they can be seen as a channel, a partner, or an indirect competitor. This block seeks to understand how each company views that relationship today.

- How do agencies fit into your flow? Are they clients, operating partners, or do they stay outside the process?
- With the recent wave of consolidation between agencies and media groups in the sector, do you see those larger groups as partners or as future competition?

Closing Question

If you were starting out in this market today, knowing what you know now, what would you do differently?

This question tends to produce more honest answers because it doesn't come across as a demand for accountability. It's meant as an invitation to reflect, not as an evaluation.

Document prepared for sharing ahead of our conversation. I remain available to adjust any point before we meet.